

I just felt I should check in to report that it's been over 2 years for both me and my girlfriend after receiving treatment for warts and we're still clear without a recurrence past the first episode (and still happily together and healthy). Honestly I hardly even think about HPV anymore and regret letting it consume so much of my time and energy only because I know that I could have been doing something more constructive with all of that energy.

For any of you who are frantically searching the internet trying to cope with a new diagnosis just know that you are not alone and I know it's scary, but it is indeed possible to move past this and live your life. I also want to thank ASHA for providing this resource because it was the best source of information I could find after scouring the Internet. Hang in there and good luck!